In this edition of Cordery Head to Head @ Home Cordery's Jonathan Armstrong talks to Professor Eric Sinrod from his home in California. They reflect on a recent survey by Duane Morris on new forms of litigation which have appeared during the pandemic.

The US is often seen as the home of inventive litigation and Eric talks about new forms of litigation which has cropped up or increased in the last year. He covers litigation over products, health care and cruise ships. He also covers more obscure claims for example against China.

Jonathan talks about some of the legal and compliance effects of the pandemic in Europe some of which are covered in our alert here http://www.bit.ly/cvrtw.

Jonathan also talks of a possible storm brewing particularly from employees concerned about the use of their data including productivity data when they were working from home.

He also talks about possible litigation over vaccine discrimination.
